The enclosed I believe is a small portion of the misinformation that surrounds the fine art of perfume making. Collecting it I never fully realized how a wonderful business can be so distorted. I believe it definitely adds to declining sales. Consumers are tired of the countless new launches, and flankers which cheapen the product. Twenty years ago there was a mystique about a new fragrance considering there were less than 50 in a year created as compared with over 1,500 today. A single fragrance takes millions to create, market, package, and advertise. Sadly a large majority will disappear in less than a year. Gone will be the perfumer's work and the creativity that went into producing it.

A fragrance created a hundred years ago before synthetics arrived on the scene employed close to a hundred percent of essential oils. Natural materials helped to add depth and character to a blend. Also consider folks had fewer problems with cancer. A regulatory association in Belgium has deemed a large part of natural aroma materials to be unsafe. A simple solution to this would be to incorporate a simple warning label that the fragrance may contain the following essential oils. A consumer can then make a choice as to whether to buy it. Instead classic fragrances are reworked to where they don't resemble the original, and that's a shame.

Synthetics on the other hand are based on petroleum. Many lack depth and were never intended to complete a large percentage of a blend without essential oils, and specialty bases. Little or no testing is performed on a finished blend. Yet a blend that consists of mostly synthetics is deemed safer. I read an article recently that DEP was found in breast cancer. It's ok to use made up fairy tale aroma materials in a finished fragrance, but not natural essential oils.

In order to reduce the declining sales I think the industry needs to cut back on the quantity of launches. Instead they need to produce quality scents, and by that I don't mean ones that cost 10,000 per bottle to produce. Perfumer's are the talented artists that create a composition, or fragrance. Each formula that is created is unique, and in itself is a work of art. However, due to high speed gas chromatography computers an aroma can be duplicated in a few hours of work by a skilled chemist. There are no secrets in the fragrance industry.

The fine art of perfume making is itself a wonder, but unfortunately few fortunate individuals world wide truly understand. Why not educate the public how unique each composition is instead of creating untruths that fill stores with scents that are gone in a relatively short period of time. Again, putting together this mini presentation I never realized how much bologna is out there on the www. More will be added when I come across the data.

My other books on fragrance display the art in its finest. Enjoy my presentation.

Several years ago, a legendary perfume executive, worked with the perfumer Jacques Cavallier to produce the fragrance.

It was a pale, dark beauty, a peony and rose that seemed in its initial moments a Romantic Keatsian figurine, a willowy girl smelling of dark flowers with the lovely tinge of blossoms just beginning to wilt, plus the scent of the face powder of a 1930s Hollywood star; as they start to decay, roses give off a wonderful death-rattle pungency.

The edge of antique face powder framed it beautifully. The perfume seemed fleeting at first (which is why I initially misunderstood it) and almost untouchable, the fragrance of a nymph on a Grecian urn. But, in fact, the fragrance had surprising staying power on skin. I remember twice approaching women with the frown I wear when I locate a scent I find mesmerizing and, irritatingly, cannot place, and both times the women replied to my query.”

What would possess a brand to destroy its own marvelous creation, to ask its perfumer to take a hatchet and hack out a flanker. YSL Beauté, McCartney’s licensee, has launched a limited-edition iteration of the fragrance each year since 2004. Metaphorically this resembles taking an authentic silver chloride Ansel Adams, making 10 successively deteriorating photocopies, then offering the final, vastly inferior version to collectors. Why?

The answer is, of course, money. You put cheaper raw materials in the limited editions than in the original, which lowers your costs and gives you a quick profit bump, and you sell that cheaper product on the back of your quality brand. Each flanker is meant to generate renewed excitement, the disappointment of 2005 washed away by the launch of 2006, which is obscured by the excitement of 2007 and so on. But money is not a good answer. The consumer eventually learns her lesson, and all your profits are offset by the damage to your brand. It is astonishing that the fragrance house would ask for this to happen.

I had never smelled any of these editions till I opened this one at my desk. This one has a top that is totally unoriginal and absolutely lovely, one of the most commercial curtain-raisers to come along in a while. And that’s “commercial” in the best sense, a shimmering, juicy, grapefruit peony-rose.

And then, in four minutes, it crashes. Badly. You can actually feel the plunge into a chemical rose, a chemical grapefruit, a wincingly harsh chemical peony. My dumbfounded assistant said, “It’s as if no one tested this on skin.” Is 90 percent of this formula just a particularly cheap grade of synthetic linalool? Can it be possible that Firmenich, Cavallier’s employer and a company that produces exquisite materials, even makes stuff like this? Can this be the most cynical perfume ever produced, a deceitful top note that winks at you exactly long enough to get you past the credit card swipe, then implodes on your wrist? This is a fragrance that wouldn't be put in a drugstore shampoo. Enough of these cheap creations, and the original will give off a pungent death rattle, decay, and vanish.

But the industry has gone from 50 launches a year to over 1,000 today, an unsustainable, unregulated flood of novelties, the whole driven not by serious long-term investments in quality perfumes but rather by marketing and pure, desperate momentum.

Shorting a beauty on the volatile $30-billion perfume market for a quick profit hit is the industry at its most self-deceptive and dishonest.

Each iteration is built atop the fake below it, giving the appearance of growth even as the structure hollows out from below. IT IS, IN SHORT, AN OLFACTORY PONZI SCHEME. And this fragrance of 2009 is the Bernie Madoff of perfumes.
